

Today's News - September 6, 2002

Today, we start with our latest edition of WhoWhatWhen - a brief round up of industry news. – A new museum planned for Washington, DC is looking for an architect. – Texas has selected three finalists for a state 9/11 memorial that includes beams from the WTC. – A school budget watchdog calls for simple school designs and architects "to be kept under control" (watch out for those curved glass-block walls and soaring porticos - and maybe there's some of that pea-green paint left over from the 60's in the basement). – New guidelines for urban redevelopment in the UK are issued. – An Art Deco treasure in Toronto is restored. – Diller + Scofidio's ICA museum in Boston continues to get praise. – Denver is dealing with the dilemma of how to preserve a Lawrence Halprin park while making it user-friendly - and safe (the same problem cropped up in a Seattle story a week or so ago). – A Korean planner heads for Algeria. – Gehry heads to bigger digs. – An urban researcher says, "Gays are the vanguard of urban renewal"...and much more.
