TOP HOMES: EXCEPTIONAL REAL ESTATE

If you're like me and love peering into other people's homes, this special real estate issue is for you. Our annual Top Homes edition showcases the 20 most exclusive oceanfront residences currently on the market in America - and the 2016 portfolio is no exception. Featuring outstanding properties from Hawaii to The Hamptons, this year's winning homes are the very essence of luxury coastal lifestyles.

Top homes, of course, are designed by top architects - as I happily witnessed recently at the AIA Convention 2016, the annual congress of the American Institute of Architects, held this year in Philadelphia. My personal highlights? Seinfeld and Veep star Julia Louis-Dreyfus letting slip during her amusing keynote Q&A that she's currently building a coastal home of her own in California; one of Ocean Home's OH50 Top Coastal Architects Max Strang being inducted as a Fellow of the American Institute

Check out our digital edition for more AIA Convention coverage. of Architects; and Ocean Home's appearance for the first time as a media sponsor of the event.

Attracting more than 8,500 leading architects and thousands of industry professionals, the AIA convention proved once again that American architecture, design and technology - especially when it comes to luxury coastal homes truly leads the world.

DESIGNING BY THE BOOK

A new coffee table book by top coastal architects is always a cause for celebration. So I was delighted to attend a discussion and booking signing with Thomas A. Kligerman, a principal of lke Kligerman Barkley, at the Boston launch of the firm's latest tome The New Shingled House. A showcase of 14 stunning shingled homes from Martha's Vineyard to The Hamptons and California to the Carolinas, the book is a testament to the rich heritage of American architecture and its beloved and iconic Shingle style. The affable Kligerman regaled guests at The Chilton Club on Commonwealth Avenue with anecdotes from the book, revealing his abiding passion for coastal architecture. I asked him which of the three residential styles - city, country or coast - he loved to design most. "Ocean," he replied, without skipping a beat. "The salt air, the clacking of halyards, seagulls flying overhead and sand under your feet: it's all such an inspiration to me." The new book is a terrific read capturing the spirit of Ike Kligerman Barkley - one of Ocean Home's Top 50 Coastal Architects in 2016 – and we'll be profiling one of the homes in an upcoming issue. The book is published by The Monacelli Press, RRP $60, and available from Amazon. ikekligermanbarkley.com

STIR UP A STORM THIS SUMMER WITH COCKTAILS BY COOKBOOK AUTHOR AND CHEF NICOLE ALONI

words by Karina Antenucci

s there any better way to start a summer beachside dinner party than with a glamorous sundowner cocktail?

"Even if you're serving a simple meal of grilled steaks, salad and corn on the cob, if you are greeting guests with an insanely beautiful and delicious cocktail, it says, 'This gathering is going to be really fun and different," says leading chef, culinary consultant and three-time cookbook author Nicole Aloni of Aloni Culinary, based in Seattle, Wash.

In her cookbook The Backyard Bartender: 55 Cool Summer Cocktails, Aloni showcases bright, tasty and herbaceous chef-driven drinks recipes as well as helpful advice, such as the right way to rinse a glass, shake a cocktail, rim a glass and create your own infused simple syrups.

First and foremost, Aloni encourages putting aside the sweet and sour mixes. "Mixes are very old-fashioned nowadays," she contends. "You can serve flavorful cocktails that rival [those served at] the coolest bars in town by using only fresh-squeezed juices, fruit and herbs."

Aloni maintains that a cocktail is best served fresh and ice-cold out of a shaker, but it's not always realistic for a host to replenish drinks on demand. If you really want to shake things up, hire a bartender.

Otherwise, she suggests filling a large punch bowl or pitcher with a signature drink for guests to serve themselves.

She likes to garnish glasses with an orange twist, sugar or salt rim or three-olive stick whatever works best for the beverage - ahead of time and place them on a tray for a more curated look and taste.

But avoid a major cocktail faux pas: don't let your blended drinks sit in melting ice and become watery.

"If using a pitcher, keep it in the fridge until guests arrive; then set it in a bowl of ice and have a separate ice bowl with tongs for guests to add cubes to their glasses," Aloni advises.

As for the glasses themselves: the smaller, the better. "The original cocktails created in the 1930s were quite tiny, served in small four- and five-ounce glasses," she says. "It's more romantic and elegant to serve smaller amounts and, that way, guests can pace themselves."

Instead of cut flowers, Aloni fills clear vases with an ingredient from the cocktail recipe, such as limes or oranges, to create a summery cocktail table centerpiece. "This can make a very pretty central table," she says. OlH

Top Homes 2016 | BOATS

uxury boats and coastal homes go together like lobster on a roll. Whether you're hoping to bag some game fish, wanting a sailboat for offshore cruising or desiring something smaller for a more leisurely weekend or sunset excursion from your private dock, the 2016 boating season offers a record number of new and unusual yachts.

From power and sail to weekenders and world cruisers, the choices are as wide as an ocean. Here are four that are certain to float your boat:

SCOUT 420 LXF

The largest boat in the Scout fleet, the 420 LXF blends luxury with fishing qualities to create a landmark model in the marine industry.

Sport-fishing boats tend to be on the Spartan side, but the 420 is downright posh with a spacious airconditioned cabin that has a private head and shower, a dining table that converts to a master berth as well as a TV and galley.

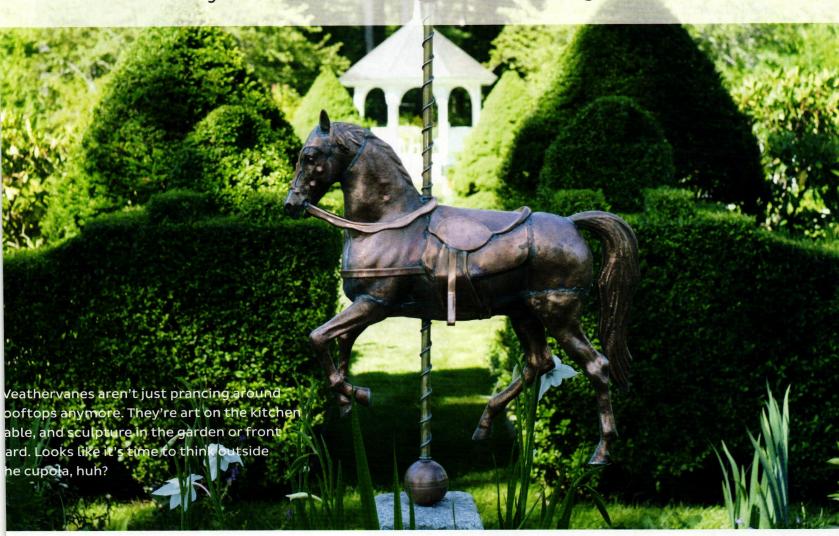

Powered by triple or quad outboards, the 420 LXF can reach top speeds over 70 mph, and serious anglers will delight in the oversized 80-gallon live bait well, stainless steel rod holders and motorized awning to shade the cockpit.

Divers will appreciate the large side door and the sixfoot-long dive platform that cantilevers from a recess in the hull. You can also add a Seakeeper gyrostabilizer to keep the 420 steady in the lumpiest seas.

A tempered glass windshield and integrated hardtop protect guests from sun and sea spray, while the

ABSOLUTE 40STL

The 40STL launches the new Sport Line series for Absolute, and it's clear they started with a blank sheet of paper to create an unusual day boat that is equally comfortable as a weekender.

When you take friends for an evening cocktail cruise or kids for a day of swimming, everyone wants to walk around. On most boats, this means people have to move, but Absolute solved this issue by creating separate seating and walking areas.

At anchor, you can lower the hydraulic swim platform into the water to create your own "beach." There are a dinette and table in the cockpit for alfresco meals and an outdoor kitchen with grill, sink and icemaker.

With the optional hardtop, you have shade with fresh air, but it can also be easily enclosed.

And here's the clever part: the cabin doesn't look huge from the outside but it has a private master suite with an en suite head compartment and shower. The main cabin can be converted to sleep kids, and it has a second galley for private meals at the inside dining table.

Powered by a pair of Volvo Penta sterndrives, she scampers along at 39 knots and is exceptionally fuelefficient. Priced from about $468,000. absoluteyachts.com

BENETEAU OCEANIS 60

Beneteau has become the 900-pound gorilla of sailing yacht builders - the nautical General Motors if you will building sailing legends such as Beneteau and Jeanneau, plus an array of powerboats from sporty (Gran Turismo) to long-range (Swift) to luxury (Monte Carlo).

French sailors are famous for winning around-theworld races, and the trickle-down from those adventures is clear in Beneteau's Oceanis 60, a powerful sloop combining performance with luxury. Whether you want to sail to Catalina, Nantucket or Cape Horn, the Oceanis 60 is ocean ready.

The wide cockpit, complete with comfortable seating, twin wheels, electric winches to trim the sails and masses of teak decking, is ideal for day sails.

Inside, the cabin is finished in teak and burled woods, with fine fabrics adding French panache. The master suite is forward with its own head and shower, while two more guest cabins have en suite facilities.

The galley is ready for a Michelin chef, and this is a yacht that's as comfortable weekending with the family

MJM 50z

When Mary Jane, wife of famed sailing boatbuilder Bob Johnstone, wanted a boat to follow his racing competitions, he designed one that became an overnight sensation.

The largest in the ever-growing line of MJMs (which stands for Mary Jane's Motorboat, of course) is the MJM 50z, a true yacht with classic Down East lines. As racy as she looks (40 knots plus), she is also highly fuel-efficient and can sail from Long Island to Bermuda and back at cruising speed without refueling.

Ideal for elegant sunset harbor cruises, the enclosed pilothouse has lounge seating, and the cockpit is like a back porch. She has two large staterooms with surprising amenities (easy chairs and desks plus the usual heads with showers) as well as convertible berths for kids.

This is also the first production yacht worldwide to offer the Seakeeper gyrostabilizer as standard equipment to relieve any queasy tummies.

Other unique features include fully opening power windshields when you want fresh air, joystick controls to make short-handed docking a breeze and a level of construction unmatched by her competitors. Priced from about $1.75 million. mjmyachts.com 0|H

CALIFORNIA LIVING

BROUGHT TO YOU BY SANTA LUCIA PRESERVE

The California lifestyle is second to none. This Ocean Home special section showcases an array of the finest real estate, services, and products, which captures the essence of a luxury coastal lifestyle.

EXPERIENCE SANTA LUCIA PRESERVE

20,000 acres of unspoiled beauty in Carmel, California

Picture yourself motoring blissfully south along California's fabled Pacific Coast Highway. Passing Monterey and the charming seaside village of Carmel-by-the-Sea, but before you reach the spectacular sea cliffs of Big Sur, you turn inland. Two short miles later you reach the weathered stone wall that marks the entrance to Santa Lucia Preserve. In an instance you are transported to another world. The Santa Lucia Preserve is 20,000 acres of unspoiled California — one and half times the area of Manhattan Island and home for 300 families in Carmel.

This landscape of ridge tops, redwoods, oak woodlands and native grasslands encompasses the last of Central California's great Mexican land grants. Through a unique collaboration with the Santa Lucia Conservancy, 90% of the land is protected as natural, wild, open space in perpetuity, undisturbed and virtually undeveloped.

With the completion of 115 residences and more on the way, The Preserve has transformed from a collection of families into a deeply connected community dedicated to living gently on the land, enjoying the pleasure and satisfaction derived from their collective stewardship of this irreplaceable California habitat.

When you visit for the first time and stay at the historic Hacienda, there is a ringing sense of quiet that settles into your core and your senses become acutely aware. From the scents of wildflowers or chanterelles just off the trail to the sight of a bobcat sunning on the green to the feeling of the fresh, ocean air in early morning while the sun warms the day, it is a true awakening. This is just one day at The Ranch Club's Hacienda. Can you imagine a lifetime shared with family and friends?

Twenty-year residents and newcomers alike agree that there exists some guide posts that set The Preserve apart from other communities. The first is the sheer scale of 300 homes on 20,000 acres next to Carmel and Pebble Beach, California. A sense of casual gracious hospitality prevails throughout the culture and clubs, which are rooted in the early California vaquero traditions. Each landowner enjoys their own sense of geography as each home site is unique and unto itself. Homeowners take great pride in designing residences that are subordinate to the large-scale landscape and fit quietly into the land, protecting the views for all to enjoy.

The Ranch Club is the heart of the community, creating magical experiences from The Fandango, an annual celebration of the vaquero traditions of horsemanship skills, style and craftsmanship with exhibitions, competitions, a dance and art exhibits, to an opera in the redwood grove, to children's summer camps and, of course, the annual dog show. This is a place where kids can enjoy the freedoms of another era and dogs can hike off leash or swim in the lake.

The Preserve Golf Club is a private, sun-filled experience. In fact, it is so private that tee times are not necessary. Veiled by towering oaks, crossed with seasonal streams, Tom Fazio's Preserve Course winds almost imperceptibly through its wild upland valley. Set against the dramatic backdrop of the Santa Lucia Range, the course never trumpets its presence; it whispers. The Preserve Golf Club is the conservationist's course exemplifying The Preserve's commitment to conservation a nearly finished renovation results in new turf in the fairways, redesigned bunkers, new tees, and a marked decrease in its water use—by as much as 35 million gallons a year. The fairways of the golf course have been changed from bent grass to Santa Ana Hybrid Bermuda grass. The replanted fairways are firmer and faster, and provide consistently superior playing conditions, thereby enhancing shot making, playability, and enjoyment for all players. The Preserve Golf Club is among Golf Digest's Top 100

Courses in America and is a treasured experience for all those that have played it. Just west of Santa Lucia Preserve are the legendary courses of Pebble Beach, Spyglass Hill and Spanish Bay.

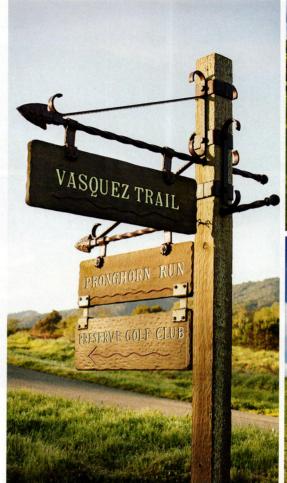

Every once in a rare while, history and geography conspire to produce a phenomenon like Santa Lucia Preserve. Where a pristine 19th century California landscape can be assured of remaining forever. Where a fast disappearing way of life can be nurtured and reinterpreted for the modern day. And, where the families and values that define a community are able to flourish unthreatened for generations to come.

Join us at a place where abundant services smooth the rough edges of an adventurous life and conservation is the cornerstone of a life well lived. Today there are homesites available from $775,000 to $2.3 million and custom homes from $3.6 to $11.8 million. #### ON THE ROUGH-AND-TUMBLE NORTH SI of Grand Cayman Island in the Western Caribbean stands an uber modern vacation home that's been designed and built to endure the test of time and hurricanes alike.

Perched on one of the island's most sought-after shorelines, Camden House at Rum Point is the winner of an international competition as well as a successful collaboration between clients and architect, both hailing from the United Kingdom.

First, the competition: husband-and-wife clients Vidal Brewer and Lisa Munday drew up a detailed design brief for a vacation home and sent it off to three architects - one in Spain, one in America and one to Nicolas Tye, an award-winning and highly regarded designer of bespoke homes in England.

The clients wanted to make a bold statement and create an eye-catching architectural landmark.

"Initially, we didn't think Nic would be bold enough, but once he got started, he was," Munday says. "When weighing whom to go with, it was apparent that he would be a very positive person to work with, and he took the design well beyond our expectations."

The architect did that in a number of ways. At the concept stage, he initiated a visit to the island, to the site and to local government officials for discussions about the building and its construction.

He had already developed a killer design for the chalk-white and very contemporary structure - one that not only complements the vibrant sand on the beach but that seems to grow straight up out of it. His determination and design won the day.

"We were lucky," says Tye. "Because we had the drive to go out and see it, the client wanted us to take it up to construction, and they obviously loved it

because it remains the same concept."

The strikingly modern home is inspired not by the island's traditional Colonial vernacular nor by the Miami modernism that's taken hold there lately. Instead, his clients wanted a design that looked east - to Spain.

"We were influenced by Spanish architecture because we lived there before moving here," Munday says. "We liked the modern architecture there and we didn't want to be constrained by what was here already."

She's specifically referencing the beach houses that are essentially whitewashed rectangles near Palamós in northern Spain, about an hour north of Barcelona. "They're simple," she says. "There's blue sky, blue sea and a white box - the architecture is quite bold."

Tye designed Camden House by taking 25 percent of his architectural cues from the Spanish precedents his clients love and 75 percent from its site on the beach. The Caribbean weather, too, played an integral role.

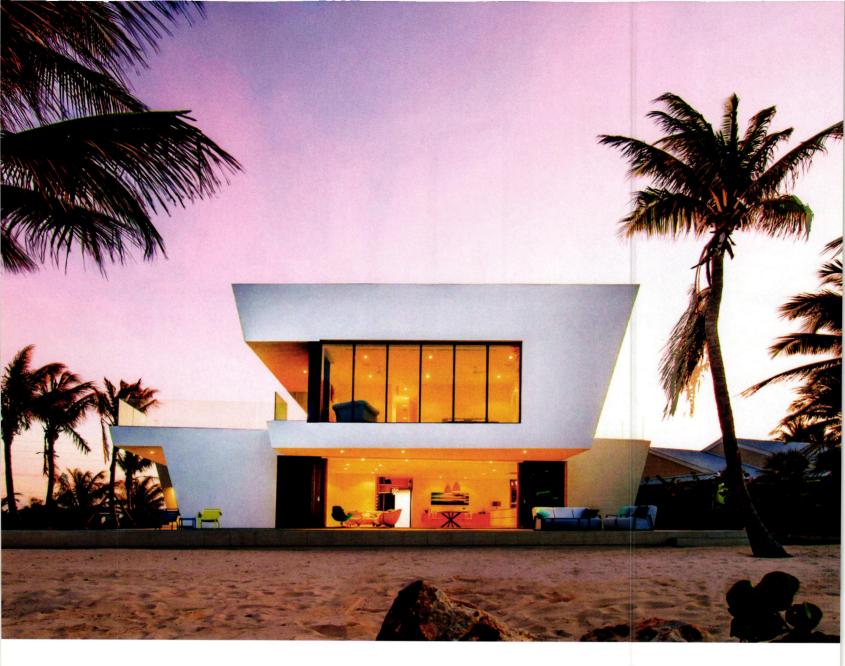

"The key was siting it for hurricanes and storms related to the structure, and creating a storm surge break," the architect says. "There's a coral bank 200 meters away that creates shallow water and a still base that's a protective mechanism."

Tye also designed a stylish L-shaped swimming pool along the width of the building's waterfront side, creating a concrete protective barrier as well as an inviting place to relax in the sun.

He added hurricane-rated windows to protect the home from flying coral debris in the event of a storm, and the ground floor is intentionally designed to be lost in a storm surge, while the upper level is saved. "It's a sacrificial floor," he says.

The almost 7,500-square-foot beach home relates to its sea view on the north with transparency, created by expansive floor-to-ceiling windows on every level; on the south, it's angled to the street with no openings or glazing - an opaque gesture to prevent overheating.

"We were concerned about how to keep the building cool," Tye says. "Temperatures, with wind and solar conditions, can be in excess of 35 to 40 degrees [Celsius]; the moisture is high and the air is salty.

I'm sure it gets to 45 degrees plus, and in the cooler months, to 20 and 22 degrees."

Deep overhangs keep outdoor spaces cool and shaded on both the upper and lower levels. "There are 20 feet of overhangs at the back of the house, so there are lovely shaded areas," Munday says.

"Having the upper level extend out over the lower level also made it practical," she adds. "And architecturally, Nic took it to the next level – he cantilevered it out and designed it cleverly for minimal solar gain."

Three roof terraces provide generous spaces for alfresco lounging as well as expansive views of the surrounding landscape, including the lush Mastic Reserve to the east.

The largest terrace on the home's uppermost level delivers a 70-foot-long rooftop deck with a garden, state-of-the-art entertainment system, shaded outdoor kitchen and bar, and an artificial turf putting green.

Local Cayman firm John Doak Architecture worked with the clients and Tye on the construction process. The foundation is a poured concrete slab atop bedrock, while a render of layered cement-based paste coats its dense stone walls.

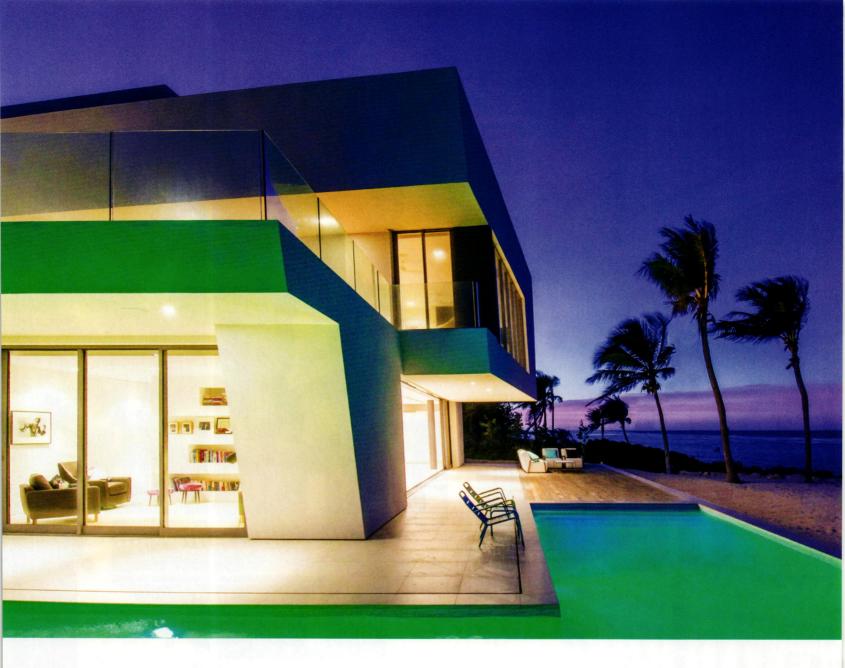

"It's pretty intense," says Tye. "We spec'd it to be grainy and to feel as tough as the sand it sits on. It would also take a major hurricane to blow it up – it's like a bomb shelter."

Munday likens the harsh environment around the home to life on the high seas. "It's like living on a boat," she says. "The steel had to be coated, even the internal framing and the sheetrock too. But then you step back, and all you see is the home's beautiful design."

Outside, landscaping is kept to a minimum, so that it doesn't compete with the architecture. The fourbedroom, six-bath residence is perched on only .69 of an acre and just 15 feet above sea level.

Sunset sonata

When the sun dips below the Caribbean Sea, Camden House becomes an alluring entertaining space for poolside sundowner cocktails, a relaxed dinner on the beach or a rooftop barbecue under the stars.

Preferring a naturally sited beach house, Munday and Brewer eschewed hedges and tropical flowers in favor of a natural look, though the street-side landscape is a little more formal.

Oceanside, the area immediately in front of the house features a handful of palms trees. More indigenous plants and boulders line the banks of a ridge that slopes gently down to the beach.

"You don't even notice the stairway until you walk out to it," Munday says. "Then, from the beach, you can't see much of the ground floor of the house because of the elevation."

Perhaps the most interesting part of the clients' architectural brief for the home is its ultimate destiny. It was not designed just to make a statement and become a Cayman landmark; it was also designed to sell.

"It's a commercial project – it's on the market now," says Munday, who works in finance and whose husband is a developer. "We came out to build a beach house and enjoy the lifestyle, and hopefully make a little money."

It's the first piece in their joint portfolio, says Tye, as the couple sought to create interest in themselves as a development team. "It was brave of them – and the market was not particularly buoyant – to create something so unique and special," he adds.

And so they'll sell it – it's currently listed with Sotheby International Realty at $6.5 million – and head back to Great Britain. "We'll use Nic for our next project in the U.K., a new building," Munday says. "It's very exciting."

Their challenge, of course, will be to create a design that's as bold and beautiful as Rum Point House. OIH

WITH MORE THAN 50 YEARS OF CUSTOM HOME DESIGN

and planning experience between them, Randall Stofft and John Cooney, partners and principals of Stofft Cooney Architects in Naples, Fla., are well versed in preliminary meetings with prospective clients.

Yet all of their years spent designing coastal homes – including more than three dozen beachfront residences in Florida alone – could not have prepared them for one northeastern family's vision back in 2012.

There was nothing unusual in the first three requests. "They wanted an understated home, with top-quality materials that would wear well and last," Cooney recalls, adding that the clients – who spend most of their time in New York City and western Connecticut – wanted a vacation home with a resort-like feel blended into the overall architecture.

"And we don't want the typical Florida architecture," the clients told him. "There are enough homes down here that look alike."

What they wanted, however, was something the architectural firm had never done before: "They wanted Hamptons Shingle style meets Florida tropical," says Stofft.

"They had numerous photos of home styles in The Hamptons, on Martha's Vineyard and Nantucket," Cooney adds, "and their specific request was: 'We want a Hamptons-meets-Naples home.'"

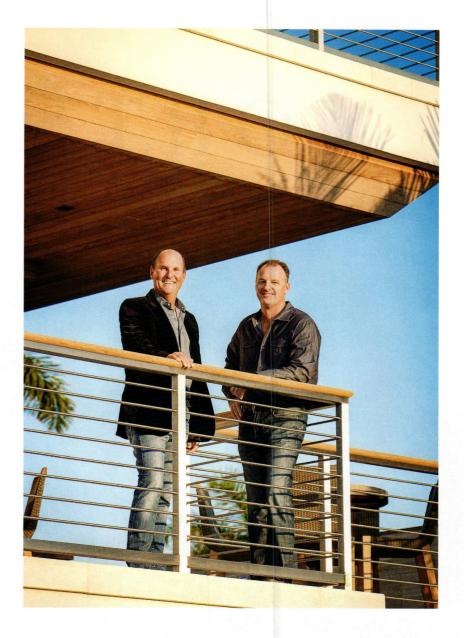

Before they could even begin working on a way to meld the two very different architectural styles, Stofft and Cooney first had to convince the clients that they were the right team for the job.

The clients were drawn to the firm for its expertise building oceanfront homes that satisfied Florida's strict codes for storm surge safety (more on this later), but they had reservations that Floridian architects could effectively incorporate Hamptons-style design elements.

Once the clients learned that Cooney grew up in The Hamptons and Stofft had designed Shingle-style homes on Martha's Vineyard, they were ready to get started.

Because wood applications like cedar shake shingles don't hold up well in Florida's hot, humid climate, Stofft and Cooney had to reinvent how to apply those shingles to the home's masonry frame.

They first waterproofed the masonry and then attached the shingles to a secondary wall system built along the home's perimeter.

The shingles were then stained on all sides and affixed in such a way that air could ventilate underneath them, thereby mitigating the likelihood that they would warp, cup or bow in South Florida's inherent humidity.

With a system in place to effectively incorporate the Hamptons-style shingled roofs, Stofft and Cooney knew they needed an equally classic aesthetic from traditional Floridian homes to complement the cedar shake shingles.

They found it by recreating a tabby stucco cladding mixed with seashells, which was once the predominant foundation material for many Floridian homes. They also used pecky cypress for the tongue-and-groove ceilings, which further connected the home to its location.

"Randy and I worked hard to introduce materials and details that brought in that tropical Naples element," says Cooney. "It's one of the reasons why the house turned out so well. The Hamptons look and the tropical details complement each other very well."

"It was fun to work with old-world techniques," adds

In good hands
Design duo Randall

Cooney Architects,
rose to the challenge when a client came to them with an unusual request to design and build a Hamptons-style home in Naples, Fla.

Joe Smallwood, president and CEO of BCB Homes, the company tasked with building the sprawling estate. "We hand scraped the pecky cypress ceiling materials on site; and incorporating the tabby on the lower level of the home, and the cedar shakes on the upper levels and roof, made the project unique."

The design was challenging in other ways. The three-acre estate is comprised of a 10,000-square-foot main house, which is situated along the Gulf of Mexico; a 4,200-square-foot guesthouse; and a 2,000-square-foot caretaker's cottage. The latter two are located across the street on an inter-coastal waterway, making the entire estate rather unique and providing, as Cooney says, "the best of both worlds."

But because the western coastline of Florida features very few sand dunes, homes that are built along the coast must feature a break-away first floor, which is designed to allow a storm-induced ocean swell to pass through it without destroying the entire structure.

That breakaway first floor needed to be concealed in a way that the outdoor living and pool areas at ground level felt connected to the indoor and outdoor living and entertaining areas on the floor above.

That's where Koby Kirwin, president of Exteriors by Koby Kirwin, came in. Kirwin first focused just off the main floor's living area, placing a placid pool with an infinity edge that spills out and cascades down a stone wall to the family pool a dozen feet below.

"The entry is intended to be dramatic," he says, noting its unobstructed vistas of the Gulf of Mexico. "The resulting view is one of calmness and serene satisfaction," Kirwin adds.

He also positioned the stairs that connect the upper outdoor living spaces with the main pool below on the sides of the home, so that they wouldn't detract from the ocean views or the water features.

He then planted a variety of tropical species – coconut, fishtail and traveler's palms, intermixed with black bamboo – to promote a lush green landscape visible from the home's side windows, and utilized large trees and plantings around the foundation to "misdirect views of the home's transition.

"As you walk up the entry steps to the home," Kirwin continues, "you are walking up and through the layers of the garden."

Although the clients had very specific demands for the home's overall aesthetic, they gave Stofft and Cooney carte blanche to design the house and its layout as they saw fit, provided there were enough bedrooms for their five children.

The architects began by incorporating design features that have come to epitomize their Floridian homes, such as covered terraces with outdoor kitchens, sun decks with plunge pools and, most notably, an open-air outdoor pavilion – equipped with a fireplace, TV and hurricane shutters – featuring a vaulted ceiling accented by tongueand-groove woodwork.

"It's not typical of post-modern Shingle style architecture," says Cooney, "but it just looks like it belongs. It works seamlessly with the design."

Similarly, the architects adapted the Shingle style motif to accommodate large cutouts for expansive picture windows and doors, especially in the rear to maximize views of the gulf – a feature that supports Stofft's and Cooney's mantra to bring the outdoors in and vice versa.

The architects also had the option of selecting a spacious, open layout – a feature of many Floridian homes – or more compartmentalized rooms that often characterize coastal homes in the Northeast.

Stofft and Cooney incorporated a spacious layout but emphasized vaulted, textured ceilings to prevent the living areas from feeling too large and impersonal.

"When you design small homes, you want them to feel open and big," Cooney says. "But when you design large homes, you have to bring a human scale to them. You want them to feel cozy and comfortable."

The challenge of imparting a level of comfort and informality to the expansive interiors was one that New York City-based interior designer Steven Sclaroff enthusiastically embraced.

Having worked with the clients on two previous homes, he knew what they liked and had established a good rapport with them. But that introduced a separate challenge. "You don't want to do anything that you've already done," he says.

The couple wanted a home that conjured up the feeling that they had traveled somewhere, so Sclaroff incorporated pecky cypress ceilings into many rooms. "It's a Florida cliché, but that's part of why we wanted it," he explains. "It's going somewhere. You went to Florida, so you get your pecky cypress."

Traditional pecky cypress is a light color, but Sclaroff used a darker finish that provides an eyecatching contrast with his choice of white-stained oak floors. "Even though the house is pretty traditional architecturally, we gave the interiors a more modern feel by the character of the finishes and pieces and also the spare furnishings."

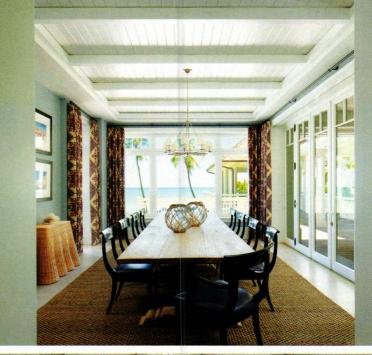

Sclaroff also intertwined nautical elements – Dutch boat cleats as drawer and cabinet handles, white and blue Moroccan tiles and a stone bar top complete with fossilized fish bones, among other examples – to enhance Outside and in Architects Stofft and Cooney designed the exterior and interior spaces to transition seamlessly, adding vaulted and textured ceilings to make the rooms feel inviting and comfortable.

Even the red, white and blue color scheme, which characterizes most rooms, furthers the home's coastal motif. "It's a perfect solution for this setting," says Sclaroff. "It's something classic and appealing and has an inherent nautical vibe."

Despite the success of the home, completed in March 2015 after about three years of design and construction – and the fact that Stofft Cooney is now working on two smaller Shingle style homes in Naples – Cooney doesn't foresee this hybrid architecture becoming popular in South Florida.

"Most of our Florida clients want a maintenancefree home but there's really no such thing," he says. "We end up using concrete, tile roofs, stucco – all materials that require very little maintenance and just need to be cleaned and painted once in a while. But the cedar shakes at some point will have to be removed and reinstalled. Even up north, cedar shakes require maintenance."

While Stofft and Cooney may not design many homes in this style, there's no denying the project has set a new benchmark for Floridian architecture. In fact, they may be the only Florida architects who could have pulled it off. "It really came naturally for Randy and me to design this home," says Cooney. 0|H

WHEN LEADING DESIGNERS ELLIE CULLMAN AND ALYSSA URBAN

glimpsed the interior of a gracious Mediterranean-style and oceanfront home near Palm Beach, Fla., they saw a treasure trove of Italianate furniture and fine art.

The owners, a retired couple with children and several grandchildren, needed their vacation home enlarged and refashioned for year-round living. Right away, Cullman and Urban knew that their clients' furnishings would be a superb starting point.

"It was the third project we completed for the couple," says Cullman, cofounder of Cullman & Kravis, based in New York City, and one of Ocean Home's Top 50 Interior Designers for 2016.

Urban embraced the project lead – armed with her experience in set design, love of Italian art and antiques and impeccable credentials as a design partner at the storied firm – and set about infusing the home with a warm familiarity that proved to be a natural match.

Today the 4,000-square-foot residence, built in the 1930s, is an alluring blend of sophistication and comfort, combining classic style, artful detailing and colors so enchanting they could be the backdrop for a blissful dream.

The design team at Cullman & Kravis, including senior designer Katie Sutton, focused on the home's soft furnishings and the introduction of some antique and custom-made pieces, working around the clients' cherished collection of furniture and fine art.

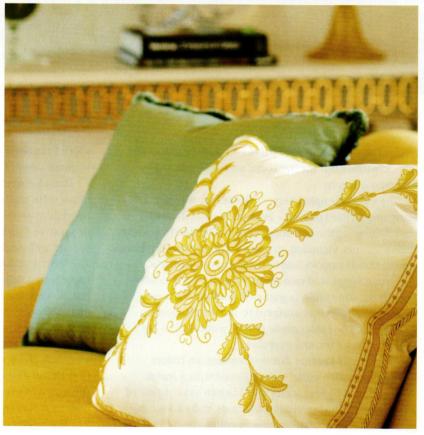

The interior's plentiful windows, traditional lines and stucco walls were an ideal canvas for the Old World ambience that blossomed.

In the living room, sumptuous Christopher Norman plaid silk taffeta curtains – framing tall windows and beautiful ocean views – provided inspiration.

It's unusual to design a color scheme around curtains, Cullman admits, but the homeowners were captivated by the yellow and white taffeta. "People usually start with an upholstery fabric or a carpet and then design around it," she says, "but the curtains were the genesis of this living room."

The room's primary color – which Urban lightheartedly describes as "taxi cab yellow" – looked incredibly vibrant in Cullman & Kravis' New York City office but proved perfect in its Florida setting.

A custom Polonaise hand-woven rug provides a neutral element, and new sofas and Jansen armchairs were custom built for the room and upholstered by Cullman & Kravis.

The armchair upholstery – silk damask with an intriguing stylized pattern – lends a chic Italian touch, complementing the new sofas, edged in bullion trim. Other Italian accents, including an oversized Venetian mirror and a pair of blackamoors, add to the European aesthetic.

Urban suggested relocating an early-19th-century French tric-trac table (a game table that reverses to reveal a plain leather surface) to the living room to let it shine. The table, made of fruitwood with a light finish, is very rare, she explains.

The base of another family treasure, an Italian pietra dura coffee table, was replaced with a metal version for "a lighter, airier feel," Urban says. A pair of chandeliers, which Cullman & Kravis had carved and gilded in keeping with one that a colleague had seen in a San Francisco antiques store, illuminates a painting of Venice's Grand Canal.

The adjoining dining room carries the same classic tones, with walls hand painted in a damask stencil and overlaid with copper and gold by Uriu LLC – a fine decorative finishes specialist based in New York City – to lend a Florentine feel.

Hues of yellow, green and blue are favorites of the owners and reflect the ocean and lush greenery outside, but also encourage a warm and welcoming informality inside. Only the study – decorated in vivid vermillion red – breaks from the palette.

Rattan chairs with a sunburst back, grouped around a table in the breakfast room, were modeled after chairs that Urban and Cullman had seen in a photograph of the home of art collector Marella Agnelli, a pillar of post-war Italian society.

For Urban, the clients' inherent style sense and collection of classic pieces made the project a joy. "Shopping for antiques, lighting and pieces that were made in the 18th and 19th centuries offers a very different awareness," she says.

Urban's husband is German, so she often finds herself in Europe, and what she sees there deeply influences her style. "To be able to see history and all the craftsmanship is wonderful," she says. "Today it's difficult to find that kind of quality. Seeing it in real life, you have a greater appreciation for the historical tradition of decorative arts."

Cullman says the project's success hinged on working with highly skilled professionals outside the firm, notably Jeffery Smith, AIA, of Smith Architectural Group in Palm Beach, who designed the home's renovation.

His ideas, including a major reworking of the master suite, kitchen area and adjacent rooms, blend fine Old World styling with an airy, contemporary feel. "His work was seamless," Cullman says.

As always, the design process within Cullman & Kravis was close and collaborative, a hallmark of the company's egalitarian spirit. "The success of our designs is always dependent on our interaction with each other and, of course, with the homeowners," Cullman says.

Cullman & Kravis has designed the interiors of hundreds of private homes across the country since its inception 30 years ago. The firm has received many high-profile accolades, including appearances in Architectural Digest's coveted ADIOO.

The award that is most significant to Cullman is the Albert Hadley Lifetime Achievement award, bestowed on her in March by the New York School of Interior Design. "It was a tremendous thrill," she says.

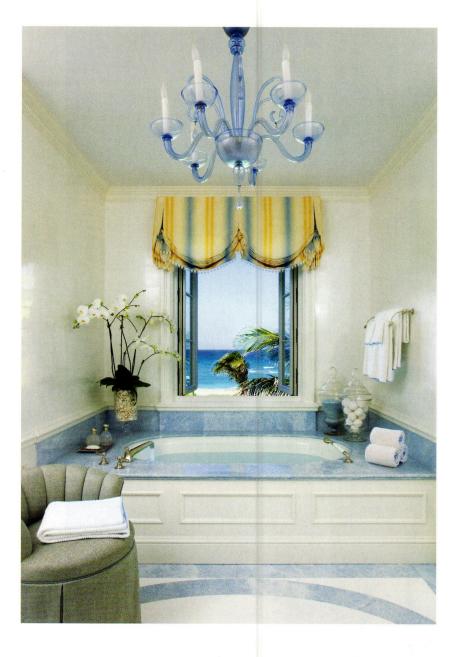

Considering that Cullman & Kravis has earned immense respect from the design world through the years, the firm's beginnings were surprisingly inauspicious.

In October 1984, best friends Ellie Cullman and Hedi Kravis were living in the swirl of Manhattan society, raising children, attending glamorous events and immersing themselves in charity work.

Craving a new project, the enterprising pair wrote a movie script and took it to film producer Stanley Jaffe, who had won an Academy Award for Kramer vs. Kramer a few years before.

Jaffe turned down the script but, as Cullman recalls, asked them to design the interior of his new home. "Stanley determined that we had absolutely no talent at screenwriting," Cullman says, laughing.

The design duo established their namesake firm and success came swiftly. Then Kravis became ill and died in 1997.

Cullman always cites her late business partner as one of the most important influences on her designs. She also credits her current colleagues – "who keep things young and fresh" – as an equally important component.

Today, besides heading her firm, Cullman sits on the boards of the Film Society of Lincoln Center, Friends of Florence and Kips Bay Boys & Girls Club. She also has coauthored two books on design,

THE PRIVATE AND EXCLUSIVE TURTLE ISLAND IN FIJI OFFERS A TRUE PARADISE IN THE PACIFIC

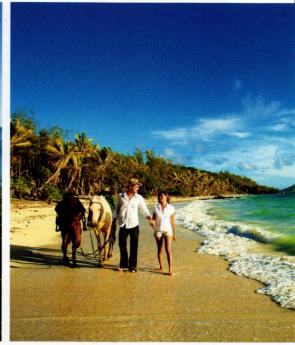

words by Paula de la Cruz

Barefoot luxury
Most guests at Turtle Island kick off their shoes the minute their seaplane lands on the iconic blue lagoon, and don't put them on again until they leave.

Our shoes have been collecting a powdery layer of sand for days.

We abandoned them on arrival at the door of our cottage – or bure as they are called on Turtle Island – and we're not putting them on again until we leave.

Clothes have become somewhat optional, too, as we settle into lazy and languid days swimming with turtles, snorkeling over giant clams, sipping chilled Fijian beers and eating lobsters under palm trees at one of the island's seven secluded beaches.

If all this sounds like a scene from The Blue Lagoon – minus the company of Brooke Shields and Christopher Atkins – it's because the romantic stranded-in-paradise movie was filmed here in 1979.

Thankfully, life at Turtle Island – a small but beautiful private resort basking in the Yasawa archipelago of Fiji, east of the main island Viti Levu – is infinitely more luxurious, welcoming and leisurely than the cinematic version.

With its wonderful islander staff, traditional but very comfortable thatched-roof accommodations, new spa, beautiful beaches and reef-fringed waters, this is one paradise in the Pacific that I'm very happy to be stranded on for a few days with my husband James.

After our 12-hour flight from Los Angeles - Fiji

Airways flies daily from LAX – we are met at Nadi International Airport by Mary, a tall Fijian woman with a resounding laugh who greets us with a warm embrace.

She whisks us to a private hangar, where we board a six-seat seaplane. Half an hour later, we land on Turtle Island's blue lagoon and palm-lined beach to be greeted by the resort staff singing Fijian songs and cheers of "welcome home."

Mama Lai steps forward and introduces herself as our "bure mama," Fiji's equivalent of a personal butler, and says she'll be taking care of us for the week. Life is suddenly looking very good indeed.

On our first morning, we wake to watch the sunrise over the lagoon from the comfort of our waterfront bure, one of only 14 that comprise the resort's guest accommodations.

With separate sleeping, dressing and bathing areas, each bure exudes traditional Fijian charm with the comforts of an upscale island resort: a king-size bed swathed in a mosquito net, hot tub, bar fridge stocked with drinks and fresh fruit, iPhone docking station and a veranda with a daybed for napping in the shade.

But Turtle is not the place for lounging indoors, and a few hours later, a boat from a neighboring resort arrives to take us scuba diving.

The late Jacques Cousteau once described Fiji's waters as the clearest in the world. We dive for an hour over giant cabbage coral, encountering shoals of clownfish guarding their anemones, a solitary turtle swimming through the reef's deep valleys and an octopus attempting to hide from sight.

A fine romance Idyllic Turtle Island has seven secluded beaches and just 14 Fijian-style cottages, offering an intimate and romantic retreat far from the cares of the outside world.

On our return, Mama Lai is waiting for us on the beach with cold drinks while taking photos of us in our dive gear. She explains that she's making a photo album about our stay, which will be our parting gift. Turtle Island is that kind of place.

Days roll effortlessly from morning swims and beach walks to alfresco lunches at a communal dining table with other guests and on to sundowner cocktails and dinners under the stars.

All the vegetables served are grown on Turtle Island, and the fish is locally sourced. The steak and lamb come from Australia and New Zealand respectively.

While the island offers optional activities like hiking, biking, snorkeling, horseback riding and diving, many guests simply hide away in their bures or on one of the island's private beaches.

American entrepreneur Richard Evanson bought the island for $300,000 in October 1972 and moved there six days before Cyclone Bebe. It was exactly the tropical paradise he'd been looking for after growing up in rainy Vancouver, Wash., and selling the cable TV business he had built over many decades.

Evanson first arrived on his newly acquired home, Nanuya Levu (he later renamed it Turtle Island), by ferry, armed with a tent, generator, whiskey, beer, canned fish and packets of seeds to start a vegetable garden, which eventually grew to three acres.

It wasn't the most auspicious start. Cyclone Bebe destroyed most of the island's vegetation, as well as Evanson's tent, but he pressed on regardless, replanting his garden and building a more permanent thatchedroof cottage.

Years later, he built many more bures and started welcoming paying guests in 1980, offering an all-inclusive, eco-efficient and sustainable luxury island resort experience.

As the days pass by, we get to know Mama Lai like an old and trusted friend. She and her husband, Jerry, work on Turtle Island for six weeks at a time, then go to their home island to see their toddler son for a week. She says Evanson is a kind employer and well respected in Fiji for providing work to villagers on neighboring islands.

For the past two decades, Evanson has also provided free dental care to the three nearest villages from specialists who come to the island each year and subsidizes several government programs, such as solar panels, to power entire villages.

Sands of time Languid days on Turtle Island roll seamlessly from romantic beach walks and gourmet meals to poolside cocktails and the chance to explore local village life.

The best part of every evening on Turtle Island is bonding with the staff over cups of kava – a Polynesian and Melanesian peppery drink resembling diluted mud, made from the roots of Piper methysticum.

At first, everyone sits quietly around a wooden kava bowl, carved in the shape and size of a turtle. But as the kava flows, so does the conversation, along with amusing island anecdotes.

Arthur, a tall and jovial Fijian and Turtle Island host, confides that he and his wife conceived their first son on Devil's Beach, one of the island's private beaches, under a full moon. James and I book the same beach right away for the following afternoon.

Mama Lai leaves us at Devil's with a radio (to call for a ride back) as well as sun loungers, a sun umbrella and a picnic cooler stuffed with lobster, quesadillas, shrimp, brownies and cold beers. We spend one of the most peaceful and relaxed days there that I can remember.

After returning to the lodge and cooling our sunburned skin with copious amounts of aloe, we board Turtle's sunset cruise with all the other resort guests, their mamas, Arthur and two guitarists.

We dance to Fijian songs but most importantly we bid in an auction of three turtles that have been kept in a pool on the jetty. The resort regularly buys turtles from fishermen to auction them to guests who then release them back into the ocean.

The auction winners paint their names on the shells so that the turtles have no further value and can't be sold again. We return to land where a Fijian cookout of grilled fish and meats awaits under the stars.

On our last night, the staff and guests participate in a typical Melanesian dance. The women move softly, curling their wrists and arms to resemble waves, while Arthur struts his stuff - swaying his hips furiously to the rhythm of drums in a warrior dance before inviting everyone to join in.

It's not all perfection in paradise: beach towels have holes and tears, wines are passable but could have been better, bures could be better screened with vegetation to make them more private and the dive operation seems disorganized. The boat came consistently late and one > morning they forgot to pick up James.

Gripes aside, on the morning of our departure we feel much like Brooke Shields and Christopher Atkins. As we say goodbye to Mama Lai, we can't help but get tearyeyed. Vinaka - Fijian for thank you - is all we can say for now. OlH
