Vineyard Shingle Style

The back of the house has a porch and a sweeping second-floor balcony that opens from the center of three bedrooms.

Patrick Ahearn Architect designs a summer home that fits in with the aesthetic of this New England island.

A photograph of a back porch. In the foreground, a dark wood dining table is set with a bottle of wine, a plate of food, and a lantern. The table is surrounded by wooden chairs. In the background, a green door with a white frame is visible, flanked by white columns. The porch has a white ceiling with two hanging lanterns. The house has brown shingles and a white trim.

The back porch, generously proportioned, is designed for sitting and entertaining. The door at the end, painted Benjamin Moore Essex Green, connects to the mudroom, then the carriage house.

below The reception hall sets the tone for the rest of the house. The details—down to the vintage-style push-button light switches—conjure an earlier time.

above A red-brick fireplace with a wooden mantel defines the living room/dining room space.

On the north end of Martha's Vineyard, in the summer colony of West Chop, there's a brand-new house with a very old soul.

Designed by Patrick Ahearn Architect, the family retreat in Tisbury, Massachusetts, for a couple with two young children was more than a decade in the making.

"The clients met at the West Chop Club," says Patrick Ahearn FAIA, whose firm has offices in Boston and Edgartown. "They bought the vacant land and held onto it for years while they were planning their dream home, a place where they can create new memories."

The clients, who had restored a carriage house in Saratoga, New York, where they live the rest of the year, commissioned Ahearn to design the homestead to look as though it were a 1920s cottage that had evolved and expanded through the century.

This home-grown feel comes from Ahearn's strategic siting of the structures. Thus, the cupola-crowned carriage house in the back yard connects to the main house via a small, subtle wing, a concept that suggests it was added to the property later and that decreases the overall massing.

"We wanted to make sure that every aspect of the interior and the exterior captured the essence of the West Chop experience and that everything you touch and feel tells the story of the house over time," Ahearn says.

What Ahearn calls the "new-old house aesthetics" start with West Chop's signature Shingle-style architecture.

"The rake boards and corner boards are not white, and they are made of shingles," he says, adding that the style allows for a more "playful" placement of shingles. "And the roof on the gable ends swoops like a grande dame welcoming you into the community."

Other exterior details—the small, recessed clerestory window in each front gable that produces what Ahearn calls a "nice shadow line," the oval window in the powder room that overlooks the back yard, the authentic wooden shutters with the shutter dogs, the wide, curved balcony outside the second-floor bedrooms and the copper gutters and downspouts—bring out the best of the past.

The house, which has water views, announces itself discreetly. A curved bluestone and granite pathway, virtually hidden by a privet hedge, leads to a portico that has double square columns. The front door is defined by a transom and sidelights.

“The wooden screen door clunks when you close it, adding to the old-house feel,” he says, delightedly. “So does the one on the back door.”

One of the house’s most inviting features is the back porch: Wide and welcoming, it is designed for sitting and relaxing as well as for entertaining. As with the rest of the house, there is no recessed lighting. Night-time illumination comes from lanterns, sconces, and ceiling fixtures.

The interior spaces, most of which are painted Ahearn White (a Benjamin Moore custom mix developed by Ahearn that’s 50 percent Linen White and 50 percent China White), convey cottage charm through millwork on the walls and beams on the ceilings.

“It’s an open-plan layout,” Ahearn says. “The spaces, which all have wide-plank oak flooring, flow together. We created portals—wide doorways, all of the same height and width—that lead from one space to the other. They are the spines that take you through the sequential rooms.”

Nooks and niches, including window seats, add to the cottagey charm. In one such windowed space off the first-floor family room, a built-in desk with a mahogany top and open shelves creates a cozy home office or homework station.

The transition of time is most noticeable, by design, in the study/porch, which is painted a cozy blue to encourage fireside family gatherings in wintertime. “We made it look as though it was a screened-in porch that had been converted, at a later time, to an enclosed space,” Ahearn says, adding that the effect is enhanced by its exposed floor joists overhead.

It is the details that date the house in such a pleasing manner. In the kitchen, for example, the central island sports a mahogany countertop—a nod to traditional furniture—and the custom cabinets are appointed with beaded millwork, furniture-like legs that conjure up old-fashioned cupboards, and antique brass hardware. And in the first-floor powder room, the sink is fashioned out of an antique washstand and topped with new ogee-edge Carrara marble.

The clients, Ahearn says, are “ecstatic because the home captures all of their imagination and then some.” So was at least one member of the tight-knit community. “One of the neighbors sent me a note saying that ‘you really captured the architecture of West Chop, and that’s not something many architects can do.’”

The timeless quality of the residence, he adds, will make it a gathering spot for generations to come.

He says its real legacy, however, lies in the fact that it illustrates “how historically motivated architecture can convey how people live today.”

Although wood has been the traditional choice for historic and classical-style projects, other options may be optimal for certain applications.

Here's the latest information from some leading companies.

Chadworth Incorporated COLUMNS.COM

Known for executing the custom designs of architects, Chadworth Incorporated makes the classical millwork—columns, pilasters, capitals, and balusters—that brings soul to historic and new structures.

Although the family-owned company is well established in the field—it is celebrating its 35th anniversary—"we never have ceased our studies to deliver the most architecturally correct columns and millwork," says Jeffrey Lynn Davis, CEO and founder. "Our specialty is delivering what is designed, not necessarily what is 'in stock,' and our expertise is in our years of experience and training in classical architecture."

Chadworth's standard designs are pulled from historical plates as well as from the Institute of Classical Architecture & Art's primer. "While equipment and techniques have advanced over the years to accommodate higher volumes and larger columns without sacrificing details, we do have craftsmen who still use tools like those of the past," he says.

The company's products, which have been used at Disney's Hollywood Studios in Orlando, Christopher Newport University in Virginia, and on the exterior façade of Courier Square in Charleston, are available in wood, PVC, PolyStone®, and synthetics such as FRP.

“Each has its pros and cons,” Davis says. “Wood usually is the best as you can achieve the highest level of detail. However, there are projects, such as those in extreme weather conditions, on the waterfront, or where cost is a factor, where I would suggest synthetics.”

Chadsworth's latest product, Premier Architectural Wood & PolyStone®, is based on the ICAA primer.

“Classical architecture is a language of symmetry and beauty developed over time into a set of orders and proportions,” Davis says. “When used correctly, those patterns create structures that are not only pleasing to the eye but also represent the mathematical and artistic skill handed down over hundreds of years by gifted architects. That is quite remarkable and worthy of enthusiasm and preservation.”

The world's leading producer and marketer of high-performance fiber cement and fiber gypsum building solutions, James Hardie, has introduced the Hardie™ Architectural Collection in a variety of textures that allow for maximum customization.

The collection, an integrated solution of textured fiber cement panels and metal trims, debuted earlier this year.

“It has a sleek v-groove joint aesthetic,” says Ronnie Nunez, the company's senior manager of products and segments. “The collection also features crisp architectural lines and a consistent appearance across a home's exterior through minimal fastener appearance.”

The company also offers several other products, including planks, shingles, panel vertical siding, trim, and soffit panels in traditional, transitional, contemporary, and even modern styles.

Hardie’s products are made from natural and sustainable materials, which include cement, water, cellulose, fiber, and silica, a mineral found in beach sand, stone, and concrete.

“Our advanced ColorPlus® Technology finishes deliver the ultimate in aesthetics and performance,” Nunez says. “Our proprietary coatings are baked onto the board, creating a vibrant, consistent finish that Products prefinished with ColorPlus® Technology come with a 15-year limited finish warranty, he adds.

Nunez notes that fiber cement siding is more durable and offers better protection than wood or vinyl siding. “It’s non-com-

Since 1996, Stein Wood Products has been supplying custom milled and imported building materials for residential and commercial projects in the United States, most notably Siberian larch.

“Siberian larch is the only viable alternative to pressure-treated lumber, which is the biggest source of ground/water pollution in many parts of the world,” says Leo Kogan, a partner in the company. “The short growing season in Siberia creates dense, hard, and strong lumber with a very consistent light color and an exquisite grain pattern. It’s a naturally durable wood, ideal for porches, decking, and siding because it’s practically one hundred percent heartwood in every grade, so it’s the only wood product in its class that does not need to be painted or treated.”

It has been used in construction for centuries for everything from roofing, siding, windows, and architectural millwork to floors, bridges, pilings, and boardwalks.

Kogan notes that it’s plentiful and highly sustainable—one in five trees on the planet is Siberian larch—and that it's one third the cost of cypress and redwood of comparable quality.

Although the wood is imported, Stein Wood Products maintains a quantity of Siberian larch in Tennessee for short-notice orders.

“We excel in working with homeowners, builders, and especially architects, starting from the design stage of a project to delivering a specified variety of often pre-finished materials directly in a container from the European manufacturer to the construction site,” Kogan says.

Kogan sees his mission as making architects and design professionals aware of the availability, superior qualities, versatility, and sustainability of Siberian larch.

“It is, he says, “shoulders above everything else on the market in terms of value.”

Vixen Hill Mfg. Co. WWW.VIXENHILL.COM

Founded in 1980 by Christopher Peeples, Vixen Hill designs and manufacturers porches, sheds, gazebos, and shutters.

“Our high quality and high craftsmanship with attention to detail and appearance set us apart,” says Andrea Beringer, sales coordinator for porches and gazebos-Ian MacBride/sales coordinator for sheds and shutters. “And our porches and gazebos have removable as well as interchangeable parts. Customers can add inserts years after the purchase and change the appearance of the product completely.”

The company, which is based in Elverston, Pennsylvania, and has 11 employees, makes products in red cedar, which with its natural tannin is resistant to insects and weather and ages well, or in a mix of species of yellow and red cedar, which have composites for parts that are in contact with the ground and are designed for extremely wet climates.

The company's newest product is a modular shed that is delivered flat in large pre-assembled components. “It's made of high-quality materials in contrast to the cheap sheds one sees driving down the road,” Beringer says. “It's perfect for homeowners who seek a quality shed that matches their high-end home and outlasts the average shed.”

Goodwin and Co. supplies top-notch heart pine and cypress for projects around the country.

By Nancy A. Ruhling

Architecture is all about storytelling, and in some cases, it's the historic products that move the plot forward.

For nearly a half century, Goodwin Co. has been creating new chapters by supplying centuries- and millenniums-old virgin-growth heart pine and heart cypress wood for public and private projects around the country.

Carol Goodwin, who, along with her husband, George, owns the company, points to the Otis Hawkins Center, an 82,613-square-foot multipurpose complex at the University of Florida that houses everything from a 125-seat auditorium to scores of tutoring labs. Its walls and ceilings are covered with 10,000 square feet of Goodwin Co.'s longleaf pine, earning it the nickname The Swamp.

It is, Carol says, a nod to the wood's scientific moniker—pinus palustris or pine of the marsh—as well as the Gainesville school's mascot, the swamp-dwelling alligator.

George, who is 75 and still shows up at the mill to saw every day, fell in love with antique wood when he pulled his first submerged log out of the water in 1976. He bought a sawmill at auction and taught himself the craft, eventually buying 50 acres surrounded on three sides by the Paynes Prairie Preserve State Park near Micanopy, the oldest inland town in Florida.

Originally powered by the engine of a second-hand Mack truck, the sawmill's operations are now spread over a dozen buildings.

Carol is quick to note that Goodwin Co., which owns the federal registered trademark for the term River Recovered, was the first reclaimed wood company to offer vertical grain, which is crucial to accurate historical restorations, and was the first to offer antique heart pine engineered flooring made in the United States instead of Asia.

The 22-employee company, which also sells sustainable, rescued wild black cherry wood, is environmentally conscious. It was George who enlisted the Nature Conservancy and Sierra Club to successfully lobby to get the state to require loggers to have a permit.

Carol, an environmental activist and supporter, is the founder of the Reclaimed Wood Council, the Wood Floor Guild, and the Association for the Restoration of Longleaf Pine. "My mission in life is to help people live healthy and to preserve the planet," she says.

As it turns out, George chose the perfect location for the sawmill. Florida's 23 million acres of longleaf heart pine were the largest in the tree's ecosystem.

After the Civil War, when southern land was cheap, northern sawmills bought large plots of land and harvested on an industrial scale, transporting the wood on the rivers via log rafts. During the transfer, it was common for some logs to be lost as denser ones sank.

By 1881, the state's river edges were clear cut, and in the years before World War II, all of the resources were exhausted.

Goodwin was the first company to offer antique heart pine engineered flooring made in the United States instead of in Asia.

The lost logs remained in the water until people like George found them, wrapped them with airline cable and pulled them up with a winch.

“They are perfectly preserved,” Carol says, adding that the mill has some 650 logs in its pond that the company bought from loggers who work under the permits George advocated for.

The company has done a number of high-profile public projects. It supplied the antique heart pine flooring—thick, wide, and a highly specified grade per growth rings and knot sizes with few nail holes—for the restoration of the Texas Governor’s Mansion in Austin after a 2008 arson.

Goodwin Co.’s curly antique vertical grain heart pine, a rarity, was used in the restoration and repair of Mississippi’s Charley-Norwood House, which was designed by Louis Sullivan and Frank Lloyd Wright.

One of the more challenging projects, according to Carol, was the conversion of the Old Sarasota High School, a historic landmark, into the Sarasota Art Museum on the campus of Ringling College in Sarasota, Florida.

Goodwin Co. made 23,000 square feet of engineered heart pine flooring from the building’s joists.

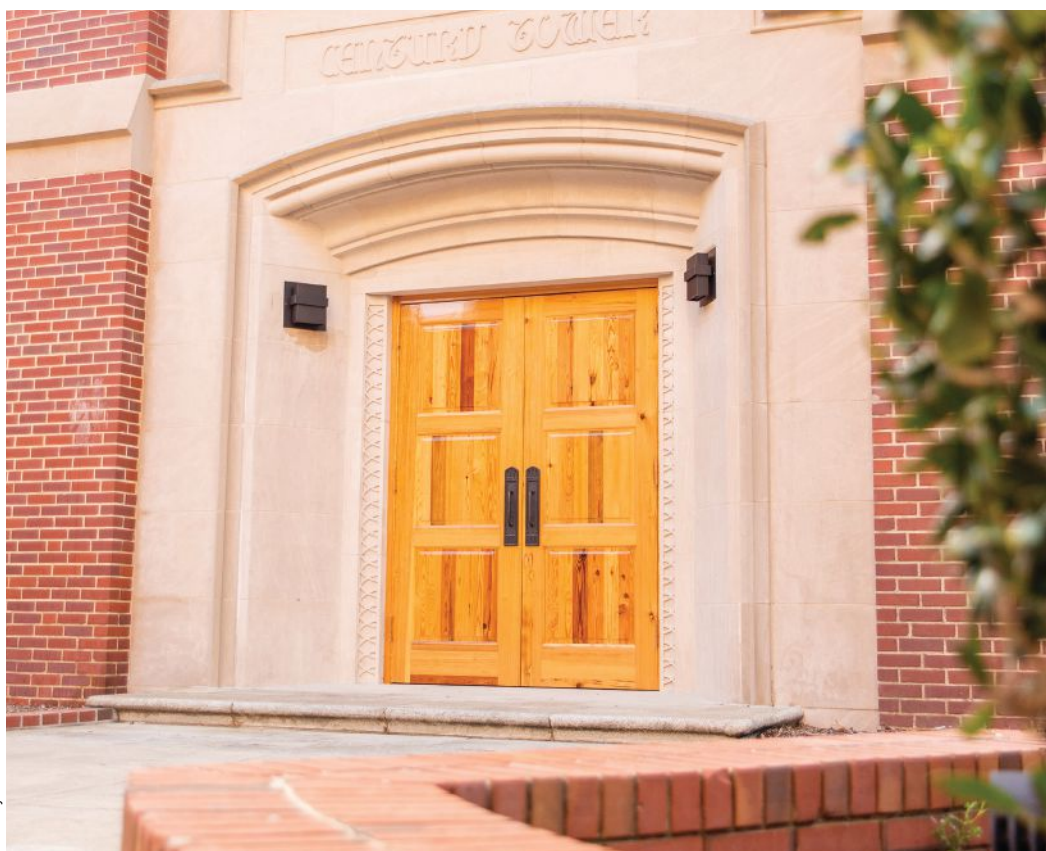

“This was the most resinous heart pine we had seen in our 40-plus years of working with the wood,” Carol says. “Because sawing the lamellas [the finished top layers of the floor] was slow due to the high resin content, we sent it to another company that said they had no limitations. The wood tore up their equipment in the first five boards. So we ended up sawing them ourselves.”

Noting that Goodwin Co. follows the 1904 and 1924 grading rules set by the heart pine industry, Carol says that “the standards from yesteryear are the way to go.”

It is heart-warming, she says, to be a part of history. “We love to be able to work with materials that are remnants of forests that will never exist again in their climax state,” she says. “To see them put to good use is special.”

At the University of Florida’s Century Tower, Goodwin Co. supplied lumber for the creation of new doors from River Recovered heart pine.

Tile Style

Moore-Merkowitz Tile creates appropriate surfaces for historical and traditional applications.

By Nancy A. Ruhling

C “Ceramic tile,” declares Susan Moore, “is eternal—it lasts forever.” Before she can finish the thought, Neil Merkowitz, her partner in life and in business, adds, “It’s our job to create it so it can be used to make beautiful environments.” And for the last 36 years, as Moore-Merkowitz Tile, that’s exactly what they have been doing.

When they set up their kilns in Alfred, New York in 1986, Moore and Merkowitz became pioneers of the American art-tile renaissance. “We were the only company making relief tile,” Moore says.

Moore-Merkowitz still specializes in the design and manufacture of handcrafted relief and field tile in the studio-arts tradition. Although their roles are fluid, Moore generally creates the designs, and Merkowitz typically formulates the glazes.

Moore’s design influences are global. “I’ve always been interested in the international scene,” she says. “I love nature, patterns, and art history, and going to museums. I look at a lot of different things, and things get funneled in an interesting way.”

The way she describes her style—old-world European with an American flair—doesn’t, she admits, really define it sufficiently. “Sometimes it’s a mystery where my designs come from.”

One of the studio’s more popular designs is its Animal Series, which was among Moore’s first. The tiles, which feature a deer, a rabbit, a bird, a goat, a sheep, or a duck, hark back to the 19th-century tradition of depicting nature’s creatures in decorative motifs on a variety of objects.

There is a lot of give and take in the design process, which starts when Moore begins putting the designs in her mind down on paper. She carves the design in clay, then makes a plaster mold and sometimes several prototypes that reflect refinements. Each collection she creates has tiles, trims, and moldings.

"Our glazes and the depth of the glaze on each piece are unique," Merkwitz says. "They have an artistic quality in terms of attention and the process of creation."

The tiles are designed to reveal the hand of the artist; the fact that they are imperfect is what makes them so precious.

"We put our hearts into each piece," Moore says, adding that "we're a boutique. It's not about volume, it's about quality."

Moore-Merkowitz, which sells to architects and interior designers through its eponymous ecommerce site and has done work for a variety of high-profile clients, including Joni Mitchell, Keith Richards, Jane Fonda, and Quincy Jones, offers some 230 tile designs and 29 molding and trim collections in more than 150 colors. Lead time is generally eight to twelve weeks; production is accomplished with the aid of two to five artisans.

"The artistic process is more interesting when we are working with designers," Merkwitz says, adding that the studio does do custom work "when it's appropriate."

Moore and Merkwitz say they always loved tile, but they never had any "grand plans" to start a tile studio.

"I always knew I was an artist," Moore says, adding that her interest in ceramics was sparked at Wells College, where she earned a degree in liberal arts, when she studied with ceramicist Richard MacKenzie-Childs and abroad during her junior year in Florence, Italy, where she studied art and apprenticed with ceramicist Gian Carlo Girard, brother of famed interior designer Alexander Girard.

After Moore graduated, she enrolled at The New York State College of Ceramics at Alfred University's ceramics school.

Merkowitz didn't discover his inner artist until he was at the University of Michigan as a history major. With degree in hand, he won a scholarship to Greenwich House Pottery in New York City, where he was a studio assistant.

They found their calling—and each other—at Alfred University.

After graduation, they secured three-month internships at the Moravian Pottery & Tile Works Museum in Doylestown, Pennsylvania, then started making tile in the basement of her parents' home.

They returned to Alfred, New York, to start their own studio and in 1999 bought the 105-acre property where, for more than 50 years, the renowned ceramicist Robert Turner produced his creations. Like Turner, they set up shop in the 6,000-square-foot 1880s barn.

They remain passionate about their work.

"We love what we do," Merkowitz says, adding that he's been having so much fun that sometimes he forgets that Moore-Merkowitz has been in business for nearly four decades.

Moore, too, is just as enthusiastic as she was when they fired their first tiles in the kiln. "I love learning," she says. "I'm still learning things every day."
