*Architects Stuart Cohen and Julie Hacker renovate

By Nancy A. Ruhling | Photography by Soluri Photography

Adding onto landmarked structures is always a challenge for architects. In fact, in preservation circles, there is much discussion about the issue, with one group advocating for following decades-old federal guidelines that recommend designing an addition that looks entirely different from the existing architecture, and the other that believes that any added elements should be in sync with the historic style.

Illinois-based architects Stuart Cohen and Julie Hacker, Fellows of the American Institute of Architects, have always placed themselves firmly in the latter camp, so when a client asked them to design a new addition for a Prairie-style home in Northwest Evanston, Illinois, they immediately opted to extend the historic style of the house.

“The federal rules, which were proposed in the 1960s and made official in the Bicentennial year, 1976, are outdated,” Cohen says. “Most homeowners we have worked with don’t want to add something that’s radically different from their existing house; they want something that looks like the original house instead.”

The Evanston landmarked home, officially known as the Kearney house for its original owners, proved to be a perfect project for Cohen & Hacker.

Built in 1911, it was designed by architect Dwight Perkins, who, as the chief architect for the Chicago Board of Education, transformed the design of public schools. Perkins, it just so happens, had shared office space with three significant architects—Frank Lloyd Wright, Myron Hunt, and Robert Spencer—in downtown Chicago’s Steinway Hall, a high-rise office building Perkins designed in 1895.

The plan of the Kearney house is based on several of the houses that Spencer and Wright developed as models for The Ladies Home Journal magazine. It features nested gables on the front that are similar to those on Perkins’ Carl Schurz High School, which was completed in 1910.

The Kearney house, built down the block from Perkins’ home, is more Arts and Crafts than Prairie style.

It features a great room used for living and dining across the entire front of the house and is bookended by glass sunporches. Its T-shaped plan located the kitchen off the back of the house, with a bedroom on the floor above. Treated as a dependency, this section of the house has a hipped roof lower than that of the main body of the house.

The new owners, knowing they wanted to make changes, consulted Cohen and

“We are geeks about historic homes, and we’ve renovated three houses all from the same decade.”

In the new family room, consisting of dining and sitting areas, French doors lead to the terrace.

Hacker before the purchase, and then commissioned them to remove a one-story 1990s addition and to design a larger addition that expands the space of the kitchen and creates a new, large family room and dining area.

“We are geeks about historic homes,” the wife says, “and we’ve renovated three houses all from the same decade. We wanted to honor the history of the house yet make the kitchen amenable to cooking and entertaining, which we love to do.”

Because the residence was ahead of its time—“It’s so unlike traditional houses of that period, with its large expanse of windows and open layout, it’s a precursor of modernism,” Cohen says—it was easy to create the more contemporary spaces the clients desired and stay true to the house.

Taking their cues from the original nested hipped roof elements stepping down in height telescope-style from the body of the main house, Cohen and Hacker created a spacious kitchen and a family room that opens to a raised terrace defined by low walls.

The new family room, which has a raised semi-cathedral ceiling, features a full-size dining table and a seating group around the fireplace, which is flanked by bookcases and a continuous mantel and high windows stretching the width of the room, based on Prairie-style Chicago bungalows built before World War I.

Cohen and Hacker also added a mudroom to the side of the house, just past the butler’s pantry, whose exterior details are based on the house’s front sunporches.

“The materiality of the stucco house, its horizontal timber banding, ganged-together leaded-glass casement windows, roof forms, and battered piers formed such a dominant architectural vocabulary that visually

Following cues from the original architecture, the terrace and new addition step, telescope-style, down from the main part of the house.

“The addition we created is a contemporary open-plan layout yet it is sympathetic to the original architecture.”

The new, expanded kitchen features a central island and a breakfast bar peninsula that has a sink. The white trim, a copy of the original, ties it to the rest of the interior.

extending it seemed the overwhelmingly correct decision for our additions,” Cohen says.

Noting that she and Cohen are not historic preservation purists, Hacker adds that “the addition we created is a contemporary open-plan layout yet it is sympathetic to the original architecture.”

To tie the old and the new interior spaces together, Hacker and Cohen re-created the original trim.

“The owners, however, wanted an all-white kitchen, so instead of the stained trim, we made it white,” Cohen says. “The existing butler’s pantry, which connects the existing great room to the kitchen, marks the transition from natural to white-painted wood.”

The color change isn’t unique: Much of the woodwork on the second and third stories had been painted white when the owners bought the house. “We like the white for the kitchen,” the husband says, “because it’s fresh and clean and modern and brightens and lifts the house.”

The new kitchen, which has an open layout and is U-shaped, has traditional-style cabinets, a central island, and a peninsula with a sink and seating that serves as a breakfast bar, dividing the space from the new family room.

The new range, placed under the existing windows, features a contemporary island-style hood. Glass-front cabinets extend the windows over the counter below.

The kitchen layout does not follow the old floor plan—the new range was placed under the windows where the original sink had been, with ventilation provided by an island-style hood that appears to float. Glass-front cabinets visually extend the existing windows above the counter below. “This arrangement gave us the best layout because we wanted to keep the original historic existing windows,” Hacker says.

In the addition, matching the existing windows was key to Cohen’s and Hacker’s vision. To make new thermopane divided-light windows that looked like the originals, they had leading applied to the interior and exterior surfaces of the glass.

In their design, Cohen and Hacker strove to preserve what Hacker calls the house’s “incredibly strong personality. The house is really plastic—it has a whole lot of moving parts—it steps down, and it’s T-shaped, and it has arms going out into the landscape. The new walls of the terrace and the mudroom reinforce the house’s vocabulary while unifying the existing house and additions.”

The homeowners, who consider it an honor to be living in the house, couldn’t be more pleased with the renovation. “We had a big party recently, and everybody said that this is exactly what the house needed and never had,” the wife says. “The great room at the front of the house is a big open space, so the back addition balances it. They hang nicely together.”

Period-inspired light fixtures for traditional design projects.

By Nancy A. Ruhling

Illumination aside, period lighting fixtures add authenticity to the scenes they spotlight, creating just the right atmosphere to make the room or the building and its décor and architectural elements shine.

Today, a score of makers is recreating them, referencing and reigniting history in every sconce, chandelier, and lantern.

Ball and Ball
ballandball.com

Ball and Ball, which has an extensive design library, has been making reproductions of antique lighting for 88 years. The family-owned and -operated company, based in Exton, Pennsylvania, focuses on 18th-century lighting but makes fixtures from many other time periods as well.

Ball and Ball's designs are culled from its own collection of antique lighting fixtures, a collection of lighting fixture restoration projects from 88 years of experience and a collection of period lighting fixture design artwork that came from a company that was in business from the late 19th century until the 1970s and that produced fixtures for many important landmark projects. In addition, the company has three tractor-trailers full of old lighting parts and casting patterns that were made using old-school traditional materials and methods.

It has produced fixtures for many important landmark buildings, including Independence Hall in Philadelphia, the U.S. Capitol, and the U.S. Supreme Court.

“No one competes with Ball and Ball across all the product lines of historic reproductions that we offer, but what sets us apart is the experience of our craftspeople,” says Bill Ball Jr., whose grandfather established the company in 1932. “Most Ball and Ball craftsmen have been here more than 20 years; some have been doing this for 40 years. My brother and I have been here full time for 42 years. It’s the experiences gained from nearly nine decades of customers trusting us with so many amazing lighting fixture projects that can’t be matched.”

Deep Landing Workshop
deeplandingworkshop.com

Dedicated to the art and craft of custom lighting, Deep Landing Workshop has been illuminating grand homes with its heirloom period-style lighting for six decades. The second-generation family business, based in Chestertown, Maryland, began by specializing in colonial styles but has created historic-style fixtures from a variety of time periods.

The fixtures, typically in copper, lead-coated copper, or brass, “are created for a particular environment,” says company owner John Ramsey. The company’s portfolio is comprised of stylized versions of original colonial fixtures and some original designs that Ramsay says “could have been in the historical record."

Deep Landing Workshop, which works with architects and designers, has created handmade artisan-crafted custom lighting for a variety of venues, including churches, country clubs, inns, and schools.

"Period-style lighting is the foundation for good design, design that endures," Ramsey says. "We believe that good design stands on the merits of proportion and form. It is not dependent on crystalline embellishments or shiny brass to distract the mind's eye. That's what I like to call the fast food of lighting design; that's what we don't do."

Heritage Metalworks hmwpa.com

Using original tools, methods, and finishes, Heritage Metalworks creates historical reproduction lighting by hand in its tin shop, blacksmith shop, and foundry. Established in 2000, the award-winning company, based in Downingtown, Pennsylvania, offers more than 200 iron, brass, copper, and tin designs through its two historically inspired lighting lines, Scofield Lighting and Heritage Traditions Lighting.

Scofield Lighting, which features 120 historically inspired fixtures, focuses on styles from the 17th to the 19th centuries that are copied from museum collections. Heritage Traditions Lighting is a transitional line of recreations, reproductions, and adaptations from various historical periods.

"Each piece in Heritage Traditions is designed not only to be historically recognizable and functional but also made to fit into the design of a home," says Matt White, the company's founder and owner. "Great design and execution equal the perfect piece."

The company's lighting fixtures illuminate a number of historic homes and museums, including Fair Lane, the Henry Ford estate in Michigan, and Winterthur Museum in Delaware, and it's a resource for architects and designers whose projects require accurate, authentic, and creative metalwork.

Noting that fixtures are not produced in bulk, White says that "by using ancient practices, we are able to produce strong, durable lighting that's designed to last. Our designs offer unlimited personalization options."

Lantern Masters
lanternmasters.com

A lighting manufacturer since 1978 that offers a vast product line of interior and exterior lighting fixtures as well as custom work and collaborations, Lantern Masters specializes in all periods of lighting, from Old World Spanish, Italian, Mediterranean, French, and Moroccan styles to contemporary and modern designs.

"We like to blend Old World styles with cleaner lines, creating a hybrid while still keeping respect to the architecture and aesthetics," says Sharyn Olesker, vice president of manufacturing and daughter of the company's founder. "We frequently use brass as the base metal for both interior and exterior fixtures since it is a non-ferrous metal and is great for all types of climates. We also fabricate in iron, copper, and stainless steel. Fixture adornments may include bronze ornamentation, fine European rock crystals, Swarovski crystals, blown glass, and passementerie."

The designs, often a collaboration with the client, come from a variety of sources, she adds, including antiques or historic inspirations such as Addison Mizner, or from architectural history books like "Casa California."

Lantern Masters, which is based in Los Angeles, has created lighting for restaurants, shopping centers, theme parks, and hotels in the United States, Canada, and abroad. Public projects include the Sarasota Opera House in Florida and Glenmere Mansion, a historic Gilded Age estate in upstate New York.

"Regardless of the period in history that the lighting represents, I regard it as the finishing touch—"jewelry" enhancing both the outside of, and within, the building structure,” Olesker says. “It is functional art and should be inviting and welcoming you.”

McLean Lighting Works, mcleanlighting.com

A manufacturer of interior and exterior 18th- and 19th-century reproduction and custom lighting, McLean Lighting Works is a father-and-son business that has been in operation for nearly 40 years. The fixtures, replicated from the antique European and American examples in the company’s collection, are intricately hand-recreated from detailed patterns.

“Every light is handmade in the tradition of years past, using the same techniques and methods with updated tools and equipment,” says Vice President McLean Moore, whose father, Mac Moore, established the company that is based in Greensboro, North Carolina.

The lights, recreated in brass, copper, zinc, and/or tin, are updated with electrical or gas fittings and feature hand-rubbed patina finishes that age and oxidize naturally over time for antique authenticity.

Through the decades, McLean Lighting Works has made fixtures for a variety of clients ranging from the White House to Walt Disney World in Orlando, Florida.

The Moores are passionate about period lighting. “It’s a link to the past and the future,” McLean says. “We love a lighting project that allows us to incorporate classic and traditional designs of the past while adding some current details to make a project timeless and bespoke.”

Period Lighting Fixtures, periodlighting.com

For the last 50 years, Period Lighting Fixtures has been creating handmade reproductions of lanterns, sconces, and chandeliers that date from 1620 to 1850.

Period Lighting has been making period fixtures since 1974, making custom fixtures to designers' and architects' specifications. The fixtures are handmade in the United States.

The company, which is based in Clarksburg, Massachusetts, offers more than 200 models, which are made to order. Its extensive catalog shows where each original was found and usually includes side-by-side photos of the original and the reproduction for easy comparison.

“We do custom fixtures, both on our own line and from designer- and architect-supplied pieces or photos,” says CEO and owner Chris Burda, adding that the company also repairs and rewires fixtures. “We have done our own research on antique lighting. We also have had relationships with prominent museums, which have allowed us access to their archives.”

The company’s fixtures are in several historic houses and museums, including Old Sturbridge Village and Historic Deerfield, and have had roles in a number of movies, including 2003’s “Cold Mountain,”

1993’s “Hocus Pocus,” and 2002’s “Unfaithful.”

Several celebrities, including Billy Joel and Michael J. Fox, also own Period Lighting Fixtures.

“Our pieces are timeless in their design,” Burda says. “They fit into any décor setting. You don’t need to have a historical building to utilize them.”
